Question	Part
8		Books have been ~~a~~ guides for humans for thousands of years. Throughout history books have allowed people to share ideas, thoughts, action, and more. Now a days, people aren't reading as much as they were in previous generations. However, through reading people are able to open their ~~mid~~ minds and explore new ideas and thoughts that ~~trade~~ hadn't occered to them before. Even though there are possibilites of misinformation being spread through books, we as a society could still learn a great deal from literature, weather fictonal or not. There are millions of books that are written from around the world. People share many things through writings. However, there are ~~are~~ possibilites for many negative ~~from~~ forms of information to spread. Misinformation can easily spread even through word of mouth. Just the same can misinformation spread through books. Opinionated written books are an ~~+~~ example. When people write books based on their own opinions, acting as if their thoughts were fact, this can lead to an overflow of misinformation, especially if these ideas are against different organizations or groups of people. Thus, even ~~thought~~ though books can be enlightening, misinformation can easily corrupt minds, and change the way someone looks at the world negativly. Additionaly, some books may ~~convay~~ Convay ~~act~~ a different type of misinformation. Medical misinformation can ~~esp exceptiont~~ exceptionally critical for individuals who are searching for knowledge about a disease or a certain medical condition that they might have. Though this may be illegal, it is also just as doable. Weather the author has harmful intentions or not, writing a book giving ~~medical~~ medical advice, especially when not being a doctor or professional at the topic can be very harmful to readers following the ~~advice~~ advice, not ~~cheack~~ ~~chek~~ checking if it's credible. Therefore, misinformation can spread in numerous ways, under numerous topics, and poorly inform readers of things that may be untrue.

Opposingly, readers can access many things and gain extensive knowledge through books. When able to be creditable and fact checked, books have the ability to make a mark on an individuals education. Even through history, many influential people in the realm of education learned many things just by reading, even when some couldn't have access to teachers. Reading can change perspectives, grant entertainment, and give power to the brain. By reading more books, our society and people who are leading it, can make ~~best~~ better choices ~~to~~, understanding the past, to give a brighter future. Thus, reading helps in more ways than one, give help for making ~~dificutt~~ difficult decisions in ~~goverenet~~ government possitions, enlighten younger generations about things they can do to help their world, and teach and ~~pr~~ provide knowledge and ~~entertain ment~~ entertainment to those who want it.

Not only is reading helpful for the ideas previously ~~mentionst~~ mentioned, but also for the world we have today. What if we lived in a world where ~~to~~ people could not write. All of our history as we know it would be ~~differented~~ different. One big reason why we know about how our world works is because the people of the past made ~~sho~~ sure to write their ideas and thoughts, ~~a~~studies and findings, memories and important ~~ev~~ events down on a ~~pi~~piece of paper. Without their writings, their research, and their very lives on paper, we could not fully know the things we know today. In this way, reading about our past enables us to find a better future for everyone.

		To sum up the ideas that have been stated, reading brings great light to the world. Though some may potentially use books for harmful intentions, others use them as a tool to grow our society. I think that books are a wonderful work of art given to mankind for a glorious perpous.
